Cyclists and motorcyclists

Although motorcyclists only account for one percent of total road traffic, they make up just under 20 percent of deaths on the road in Great Britain. They have a higher crash and injury rate than vehicle occupants. This is because they do not benefit from all the protective features, such as seat belts, airbags and other impact protection features that vehicles offer.

Cycling in Great Britain is increasing because it is an excellent way to get about and provides a wide range of health and environmental benefits. Unfortunately, it also carries a certain amount of risk, and so we need to ensure that more cycling does not lead to more cycling casualties.

What cyclists would like drivers to know:

They feel threatened by inconsiderate driving

They need to keep away from the gutter to avoid pot holes and debris

They feel exposed when turning right

They feel very threatened by close overtaking

They are not deliberately trying to get in your way and slow you down

When they are riding in the middle of their lane, this is so they can see and be seen better and often because there isn't room for drivers to overtake them safely

Large vehicles pose a very high risk to them when they turn left at junctions.

What drivers would like cyclists to know:

They find it very difficult to see cyclists who don't use lights at night

They get annoyed when cyclists ignore traffic lights

They get dazzled when very bright cycle lights are not adjusted correctly

They get annoyed when cyclists ride two abreast (even though it's not illegal)

They sometimes find it difficult to predict what a cyclist is going to do

They always understand why cyclists sometimes ride in the middle of the lane

When driving large vehicles, they can find it very difficult to see cyclists on their nearside, even with all their extra mirrors accidents don't have to happen
